Descent Newsletter (17) September 2022

We're catching up with news from Wild Places with this newsletter ...

Every year we stock a limited number of the Underground Worlds calendar, which has proved tremendously popular. And every year it sells out, leaving a few covers making enquiries and being disappointed. The bottom line is that if you intend to order a copy, don't leave it too late (especially given the current state of play with Royal Mail strikes). A few copies are in stock now with the rest scheduled to reach us early next week. Click the image for more information.

We have new titles available as well. The superb Underground Symphony is back in stock and is now joined by another volume by the same photographer, Philippe Crochet, on the Grottes de Han. Joining it is another highly illustrated book, Lechuguilla Cave, with a review coming in the forthcoming Descent (288). It has been many years since Lechuguilla featured in a book of this standard, so learn more online and get your order in early.

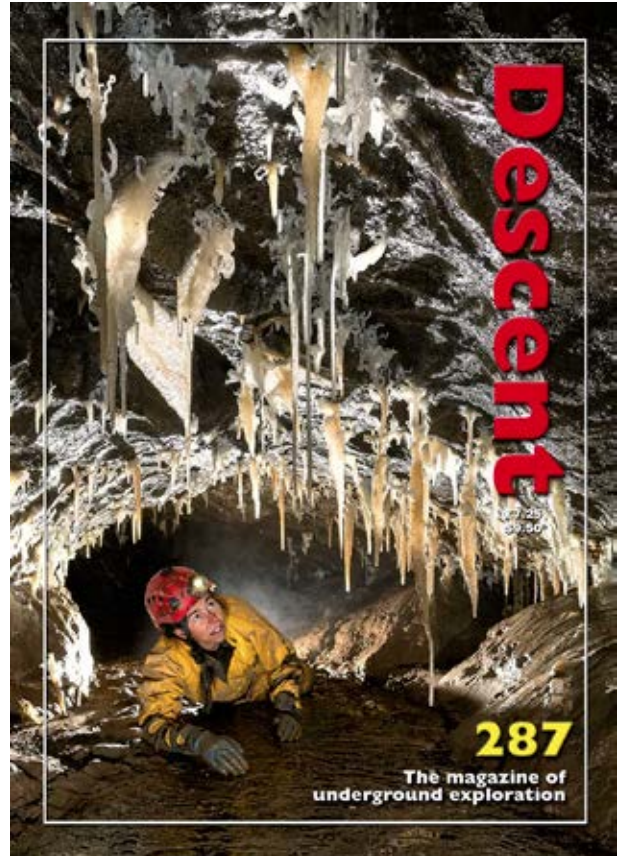

We are also having a clear-out of older stocks of Descent mugs and T-shirts. Both are high quality: the mugs are ceramic baked and dishwasher proof so that they will not fade, and the pre-shrunk T-shirts are made using ethically sourced cotton and workers are paid a fair wage and the environment is protected from pollution. These are on offer with a second item half price, so to help us clear these out follow the links.

Finally, we come to the next Descent, which we're hard at work to imminently take to print. It has extra pages (one of our 'special' issues) and is rich in fine photographs, news reports and articles, including two on major UK breakthroughs plus the results of our caption competition and a healthy amount of cave science and thoughtful analysis of conservation issues. If you have not done so yet, it is time to renew your subscription (or take out a new one) so that we have your details ready for the next posting, and if you have missed the current issue click on the image below to buy a single copy. Delay not ...

There is plenty more to find online of course, so do make a visit and we will hope to hear from you.

Best wishes from
Chris & Judith
